Every plastic cap has a lost bottle somewhere out there in the world.

These orphan caps have been combined in a fun way to create movable toy marionettes in an effort by fine artist Cynthia Jacobs to connect recycling and how we use plastics, with the effects on children and the planet.

Each colorful marionette is between 12” and 18” long, and each moves on strings with a bottle handle.

“Back in the day, we made toys from whatever we had. Today, that seems to be a lost art for children. I really liked this project because first collecting the caps was fun, but mostly I love the concepts of recycling new into old, while old is made into new.”
